Introduction

Skin, the body's largest organ, is a magnificent, complex, multi purpose organ. It has been discovered more about the way the skin functions, and its components structure, in the last ten years than in the last two hundreds.

The skin's functions:

- Protects the body against injury, heat & light radiation
- Helps the penetration of chemical agents and invasion of microbes & microorganisms
- Regulates body temperature
- Eliminates a number of harmful substances resulting from the metabolic activities of the intestine & liver
- Secretes hormones & enzymes
- Acts as an external sensory organ
- Plays an immunological role by cooperation with Langerhans cells

The skin's components & structure:

Within one square inch of skin, varying from 1mm to 4mm in thickness, there are:

- 650 sweat glands
- 65 hair follicles
- 19 yards of capillaries
- 78 yards of nerves
- Thousands of sensory cells, nerve endings & Langerhans cells
- Melanocyte cells
- Tyrosinase enzyme responsible for producing melanin

The skin's layers:

The surface of the skin is made of a conglomeration of dead cells. Underneath the surface, there are very thin & distinct layers, which are called:

- The Epidermis
- The Dermis
- The Hypodermis

Epidermis:

The epidermis, that it's thickness varies from 0.04mm to 1.6mm, is an important layer. The Langerhans cells, responsible for the immunology of the skin, the melanocytes and tyrosinase enzyme, responsible for the production of melanin and color, are located in the epidermis.

This is the layer of skin to which, cleansing, exfoliating or hydrating products are applied.

Why is epidermis important?

- It is responsible for the look & the health of the skin.
- It protects the skin from moisture loss & the penetration of chemical products and bacteria.
- It is a metabolically active tissue that synthesizes the lipids.
- It acts as the initial barrier to oxidant assault.
- It houses essential free radical scavengers such as vitamins E and C & super oxide dismutase.
- It is able to create large amounts of glycosaminoglycans & ceramides.

The epidermis holds a large amount of water. The younger the body is, the more water there is in the skin. The skin's capacity to retain water decreases with age, making the skin more vulnerable to dehydration & wrinkles. The epidermis is also the first barrier against immunological aggressors, thanks to the Langerhans cells. (Langerhans cells are ultraviolet radiation (UVR) sensitive). Even minor UVR exposure will damage the Langerhans cells enough to reduce the skin's immune capacities.

There is also a natural moisturizing factor (NMF) in epidermis. Exposure to harsh detergents & climatic conditions can result in decreased NMF levels, rendering the skin fragile and dry.

Dermis:

The second layer, or dermis which is 5 to 7 times thicker than the epidermis, lies below the epidermis and is connected to it by the basement membrane. The dermis consists of a thick connective membrane criss-crossed by blood vessels, lymphatic vessels, nerve fibers and many sensory nerve endings. Collagen and elastin protein fibers, the two main components of the dermis, act as a structural support system for the nerve fibers, hair follicles, blood vessels, and oil and sweat glands located in this layer, and also provide the skin strength & elasticity.

Why is dermis important?

- It nourishes the epidermis by means of its vast network of capillaries and blood vessels.
- It forms a supporting framework, composed of collagen & elastin protein fibers.
- It is responsible for the skin's elasticity.
- It acts as a water storage site.
- It protects the body from mechanical injury.
- It plays an important role in sensory perception and as an internal regulator.

Hypodermis:

The hypodermis is the skin's third layer that connects the skin with the muscle tissues. This layer is highly elastic and has fat cells acting as "shock absorbers", thereby supporting delicate structures such as blood vessels and nerves.

Differences in skin due to sex:

- Most human bodies are alike and the differences are usually minor. The skin is no exception. The greatest difference is attributed to sex and the following observations have been made:
- Chemicals from the male glands increase the thickness of skin and strengthen the tissue of the dermis.
  - Men's skin is hairier somewhat coarser than women's.
  - Men have more sweat glands.
  - Male skin cells have a somewhat deeper color due to the greater amount of melanin in the skin.
  - Men have greater output of sebaceous glands.
  - The chemicals from the female sex glands make skin softer.
  - Women have fewer and shorter body hairs, but the hair on their head is finer and grows longer.
  - Many men lose hair or their hair grows gray or white and more sparse.
  - Race has very little effect on people's skin and may indicate only a slight variation in the distribution of skin glands.
- Dark color is due to specific skin cells and these cells exist in about the same quantity in all people. In some groups of people, the cells are larger or produce more melanin. Other skin conditions are inherited such as the color of the hair and the fairness of the skin.

SUN PRO

The power of the sun is not something we can underestimate. The sun after all is the worst enemy our skin faces every day. The sun along with stress and environmental factors create a barrage of free radicals which attack, weaken and damage our skin on a cellular level. In order to preserve our looks and live well, we must be willing to defend our skin every day from the sun damage and free radicals which accumulate as we age and can cause skin cancer. Seagull Sunscreen Products with high protection factors for all-day protection are the strong barriers between the skin and the sun.

BABY

Babies and small children are far more sensitive to their environment than adults and even tiny amounts of synthetic substances can cause allergic reactions. Since an infant's skin is much thinner and significantly more permeable than an adult's, it's vital for parents to use only natural products on their baby's skin to ensure they have not used any toxins at the beginning of life.

Seagull Baby Products have formulated from a rich blend of natural ingredients that effectively smoothes skin texture and provides barrier protection.
